Men who experience feelings of anger and/or that behave in violent ways are limited in where they can go for support. In one society, the research may have implications to practice in the disciplines of health, social care and crime in the reduction of problematic and damaging for all involved. Interventions to address such behaviours can be valuable in terms of helping victims, individual perpetrators and wider society. The research may have implications to practice in the disciplines of health, social care and crime in the reduction and primary prevention of violence.
